KLCS' CELEBRITY CHEF CORNER

Joanne Weir, a James Beard-award winning author, who's been on PBS for 20 years and now on Create, talks to KLCS about her favorite dish from her time at the famed Chez Panisse, what she does when she isn't on a set teaching us how to cook, and sharing life's simple food pleasures, like sampling herring in Amsterdam.

You're on CreateTV here in Los Angeles. Do you get feedback that your show is a guilty pleasure in a noisy world?

We get great feedback, which is so nice. It's funny, I've been hearing that recently, people have been saying that. I do think that's what food television is. I do agree with you, and it's funny it's not even people who always are cooking, but they love to just sit there and watch. I have so many people who come on my trips and say, "I don't really cook, but I love to watch your show." I have so many people that love to cook too.

What is the aim of your show?

I love food-wine travel and I love discovery. What I like to do is find things along the way and then share them with people. I love to teach, I love to give my knowledge, I like to get people excited about food, especially through my travel. So if you're a person that can't travel as much as I get to, you can kind do it virtually. And I love to be able to share that.

I love the scene when you were eating herring at the market in the Netherlands, you really savored the moment. It made me want to be there.

Oh, I love hearing that, that makes me happy, because I'm not trying to have people all travel with me, but I do love that. Just to get people excited about food. And that food is just food. I studied with someone who used to say, "It's not food, it's just food." We all have to do it. My mom used to say, "We all have to eat three times a day, it should be a great experience." And that's what I like to share. I like to keep people at the table, I like to have people cooking with their friends and their family. Last night I did a charity dinner at my house, it was six people and they thought they were just coming over and having this really wonderful dinner served to them, and instead I had them up making pasta with me. They had so much fun and they were all going, "I've been so intimidated about doing pasta, you made it look so easy, I'm going to go home and do it." That's really what I love.

You were a chef at Chez Panisse, how was that experience?

Chez Panisse was extraordinary and have I really ever left? No. I was there from '85 to '90 and I still go back and I work there sometimes. After that, I couldn't work anywhere else, I couldn't work in any other restaurant. It was such an extraordinary experience, there was nothing that could top that.

Do you have a favorite dish that you make?

There are so many dishes that I still do from there. I love this soufflé, it's made with gruyere and roasted garlic that we cook on a platter as opposed to in a soufflé dish, that cooks in 15 minutes. I love that dish. I did it when I first started doing television. I've been on public television for 20 years. I should do that again because it was so good (laughs).

What was your path to being a chef and what made you originally want to cook on TV?

I'm a fourth generation professional cook. My mother was, my grandfather and my great grandmother. I grew up with just incredible food and my mother was passionate about food. The table was very important to us and my family. My very first book in 1994, right after I worked at Chez Panisse, was called "From Tapas to Meze". I went on a lot of TV shows, the book did really well and somebody put together a video and sent it to KQED and a couple producers called and said, "You really have it for television. We are looking for a woman and you'd be perfect."

What's the most frequent question you get from fans?

How do I stay thin? I'm not thin! They say that all the time. Also: what's my guilty pleasure? The guilty thing is potato chips.

The other thing, my grandfather, with those chicken salad sandwiches, he always served homemade potato chips. I have a love of potato chips.

What do you do when you're not on the show teaching us to cook?

The one thing I really love in my life, I love to travel, so I love these courses I do every May and October. You probably have seen them on this show. I rent villas, I have several locations in Italy, Morocco in Marrakesh, two in Spain, the south of France and Greece.

So far everyone has had a Julia Child story, do you have a Julia story?

The first time I met Julia, I was at an IACP (International Association of Culinary Professionals) conference and Julia tapped me on the shoulder and said, "Would it be ok if I sit down and have lunch with you?" We were supposed to network and what are you going to say to Julia, "Nah, this seat is taken." "Of course you can sit down!" My mother worked for a long time with a woman named Charlotte Turgeon who was also a cookbook writer, and Charlotte had gone to college and roomed with Julia, so it was fun because I was able to tell Julia about that. So that was really, really nice, so we had something in common that we could talk about. So the next time I saw her, I was walking down the hall and I said, "Hi Julia, how are you?" She goes, "No Joanne, how are you? And that's the thing I remember, that Julia cared more about other people. And it was such a great quality. She cared to make sure it wasn't about her. That was great about her. I loved her."

When you're in L.A., do you have any favorite places to dine?

I love Gjelina in Venice. I love L.A. because my best friend lives there, I really do love L.A. I think I'm going to come down for the Taste Awards because the show's been nominated for different awards.
